Truman Peace Center In Israel To Be International Study Spot

A cornerstone was laid near Hebrew University for a peace center that former President Truman said might provide "a fresh start" in finding ways to prevent war.

The Harry S. Truman Center for the Advancement of Peace, a $4.1-million project financed by 41 equal donations, mostly from American Jewish leaders, will serve mainly as an international study center, says James Feron, in the New York Times. It will function as part of the University covering such subjects as international relations, sociology, comparative religion and political theory. A $50,000 Truman Peace Prize also will be awarded annually.

The June ceremony took place without the former President, who remained in Independence, Missouri, on the advice of his doctors. Thurgood Marshall, the United States Solicitor General, represented Mr. Truman.

But the former President had prepared his own remarks and they were spoken by a longtime associate, David Noyes. Before conveying Mr. Truman's message, however, Mr. Noyes spoke of the former President's physical condition and his feelings about not being able to attend.

"He works, he reads, and writes," Mr. Noyes said of the eighty-two-year-old Mr. Truman. "His legs have given out a bit, but nobody was more disappointed in not being able to come than he was."

Mr. Noyes nodded his head toward Miss Rose Conway, who was sitting with 600 others in the University auditorium, and introduced her as Mr. Truman's personal secretary since the days of his Presidency. "This is her first time out of the country," Mr. Noyes said,

"but Mr. Truman wanted her to come as an indication of his personal interest."

Referring to the recognition of Israel by Mr. Truman on the day she proclaimed her independence, Mr. Noyes said, "President Truman came here in 1948 and he has never left." The audience burst into applause. "And he's never going to leave," Mr. Noyes added to more applause.

The former President's message said, "I had hoped against hope that I would somehow manage to make the pilgrimage to this ancient city." But, he said that in deference to family and physicians, says the New York Times, "it became necessary for me to postpone my visit to Jerusalem until this fall."

Mr. Truman spoke of the nuclear arms race, of his own unsuccessful efforts as President to turn over the process and the bomb to the United Nations for safekeeping and of the now-expanded "nuclear club."

"Witness the paradox of a peace-indoctrinated nation, India, having to give serious thought to the production of its own bomb," he said. Although Mr. Truman did not refer to Israel, a similar problem has confronted many Israelis.

"So we meet here to try to make a fresh start," Mr. Truman said. "Here we will give serious consideration to any new practical approach that could help to advance the cause of peace."

"All will be welcome," he added. "There are no restrictions as to national origin, ideological commitment or religious differences."

He said that the annual peace award was now in effect and that he hoped to "great the person" who in the judgment of the trustees

ISRAEL VOLUNTEER PAY CUT TO FIGHT INFLATION YIELDS TOO LITTLE BY FAR

The General Federation of Labour (Histadrut), in an unprecedented step decided to waive wage-earners' claims for higher cost-of-living allowances during the next six months in view of the economic recession in Israel, says the London Times. Under existing procedure, 650,000 workers were entitled to an automatic adjustment in the cost-of-living allowance in July because the cost-of-living index had risen.

The recession has been marked by increasing unemployment, a building slump, and consequent reductions in industrial production and business generally, but leaders of the Government have said this is what is necessary to cure the economy. They have also given a warning that an increase in cost-of-living allowances would put 80m. to 90m. Israeli pounds (approximately $10m.) in circulation and that most industries could not absorb higher labour costs without raising prices.

The very recent decision was taken in the executive committee of Histadrut by 68 votes to 56. The motion was supported by an alignment comprising the Mafai and Abudat Haavodah parties. It was decided to compensate low income workers, says the London Times, and large families through national insurance grants.

Four months ago, many Israelis were saying they were voluntarily giving up part of their pay to fight inflation. Later, says the New York Times writer, James Feron, they discovered they had been deluding one another.

The widely publicized movement, which even prompted Premier Levi Eshkol to cancel some taxes he had imposed only weeks earlier apparently had ended in failure.

The pay cuts were to have been voluntarily deposited in account No. 45 at the Bank of Israel. A committee had a look at the deposits. Instead of the expected $3.3-million, it is reported to have found $1,600.

Without officially announcing the total receipts, only weeks earlier, apparently the committee said that unless sufficient sums were deposited soon, the existing deposits would be refunded.

It said that some public bodies that originally announced participation had failed to deposit the money.

Many pledges had been heavily hedged, depending in some cases on the actions of employers or other groups. Some employees had pledged to forgo portions of payments they had not yet received, supposedly automatic increments long overdue and then under negotiation.

The pay waiver committee attributed its lack of success to price rises, higher taxes, a threat — since fulfilled — that cost-of-living allowances might be canceled by the Government, and cutbacks in employment and in wage policies.

In fact, the waiver movement was overwhelmed in the public's mind by mounting economic woes. Talk of civic responsibility in March and April gave way in May and June to talk of dismissals and recession.

The waiver movement never had much of a chance after trade unions and many professional bodies distinctly dissociated themselves from it. Those who had urged the voluntary pay cuts also were not impressed when the Parliamentary Finance Committee decided to raise the salaries, says the New York Times, of the Premier, Cabinet ministers, and Knesset (Parliament) members by eight per cent this year and a further five per cent next year.

But the failure of the paywaiver movement has been made up by more conventional anti-inflationary measures. The Government has fought wage-rise demands, taking on a costly Haifa port strike to indicate its determination, and cut down on some of its own spending.

Finance Minister, Pinhas Sapir, told a visiting delegation from the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development that the first positive signs of the policy of slowing up the economy were already apparent. He spoke of Government incentives for making enterprises more efficient and the restriction of consumption in non-vital goods and services.

He emphasized that the Industrial Development Bank of Israel, which is asking for a loan from the World Bank, plays an important role in the development of Israeli industry. The delegation members were understood to have told Mr. Sapir that they appreciated the efficient use that Israel had made of her loans.

In another anti-inflationary move, the leading Government coalition members, Mafai and Abudat Haavodah, agreed that the semi-annual cost-of-living allowance should be canceled for July.

Usually a rise of three per cent in the cost-of-living allowance means an automatic increment for hundreds of thousands of Israeli workers, says the New York Times. Under the new measure, only low-income families would receive any compensation.

Service For Jews, Shot By Nazis, Held In Kiev By U.S. Rabbis

A group of twenty-two American rabbis conducted a memorial service in Kiev at Babi Yar, where thousands of Jews were shot by the Nazis after the capture of the city in World War II. During a solemn inspection of the site, Rabbi Albert M. Lewis, of Temple Isaiah, Los Angeles, turned up a memento, says the New York Times, of the days when the Germans drove truckload after truckload of Kiev's Jews to Babi Yar, a ravine at the edge of the city, for execution.

Walking through the area of the ravine, which is now filled and surrounded by housing projects, Rabbi Lewis passed a place where trucks had recently torn up the earth. Seeing an object projecting from the ground, he picked it up and discovered that it was a Russian-language textbook for Germans.

In a speech during the memorial service, Rabbi Jacob J. Weinstein, president of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, pleaded for the erection of a monument to the victims of Babi Yar.

"We stand here on hallowed ground where many thousands of our brethren lie buried in a hasty pit," he said. "We cannot bring them back to life. We cannot separate their conning bones, but we can perform an act of poetic justice. We can insist on a special memorial to those who were so singularly selected for this bitter martyrdom."

Authorities in Kiev informed the rabbis that a competition was under way for the construction of a memorial to the victims of the

U. S. Supreme Court Justice, Certain To Become A Power, Shows Compassion For Poor, Empathy For Big Business

When President Johnson appointed Abe Fortas to the Supreme Court, it was widely predicted that he would be a liberal Justice. Now, after Justice Fortas's first term on the Court, it appears that the word "liberal" is not sufficiently precise. He is a Great Society liberal. Not all Presidents have been successful in infusing their philosophies into the Supreme Court, says Fred P. Graham, in the New York Times. Jefferson, Madison and Theodore Roosevelt learned this after they respectively appointed William Johnson, Thomas Story, and Oliver Wendell Holmes. Other men have also moved in unexpected directions after they donned the lifetime robes.

But the record of Justice Fortas already reveals a deep commitment to the peculiar duality that marks Great Society liberalism: Compassion for the poor and empathy for big business.

He has lived up to his libertarian reputation earned as counsel for the accused in the famous Supreme Court case of Gideon v. Wainwright, which established the right of counsel for the poor.

In criminal appeals and civil liberties cases he has consistently voted as the crucial fifth man of the activist bloc formed by Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justices Hugo L. Black, William J. Brennan Jr., and William O. Douglas.

He has usually favored increased Federal Court activity on behalf of Negroes' rights.

But, overshadowed by the landmark decision limiting police interrogation, Justice Fortas broke with the New Deal-style liberals of the Warren majority in a strong dissenting call for a softer Government line in anti-merger and anti-monopoly actions against big corporations.

A majority composed of the Chief Justice and Justices Black, Douglas, Brennan, and Tom C. Clark had examined the Federal Courts of Appeals jurisdiction to review Federal Trade Commission anti-merger cases and found the previously undiscovered authority of the appeals courts to enjoin mergers while the commission investigates them.

In his characteristically pungent style, Justice Fortas — formerly a Washington lawyer with a list of prominent corporate clients — attacked the bigness-is-badness theory and revealed a dubious regard for the F.T.C., says the New York Times. Some mergers, he said, are "distinctly beneficial to the achievement of a competitive economy," citing the example of two little concerns that merge to compete with a big one.

The high court should not encourage the F.T.C. in a "machinthe worst atrocities of World War II.

During the memorial service, which was described by a spokesman for the delegation of rabbis in a telephone interview from Kiev, one rabbi read the poem "Babi Yar," in which Yevgeny Yevtushenko, the Soviet poet, criticized the absence of a monument there. Mr. Yevtushenko, who wrote the poem in 1961, was denounced at the time for not having mentioned that Ukrainians and Russians were among the victims.

After a memorial prayer, Rabbi Theodore H. Gordon, of the Main Line Reform Temple, in Wynwood, Pa., chanted in Hebrew several verses from the Book of Lamentations, says the New York Times. Residents of nearby apartment houses came out into the hot sun to watch as the rabbis honored the dead.

gun approach" to mergers, he said, but should instead "indulge the Congress in its desire that at least the Federal Trade Commission should move with caution and deliberation."

This dissent — and another that day protesting the Court's broad interpretation of the Federal anti-monopoly law — marked Justice Fortas's first departures from the Warren majority on major substantive issues.

But it was typical of his style as a justice that three others — Justices John M. Harlan, Potter Stewart, and Byron R. White — joined with him. This served clear notice that the addition of another Lyndon Johnson-style liberal could produce a five-man majority to make the Fortas position the doctrine of the Court.

Justice Fortas is not attracted to noble and lost causes (he has never dissented alone), but tends toward points of view that can command the support of others. He has adjusted smoothly to the Court's system of specialization and seniority, which is closer to the Congressional model than most people realize.

As a new Justice, he has already staked out areas of expertise in juvenile court procedures, civil liberties, and anti-trust. When new cases on these subjects develop, he strongly influences the decisions and often writes the opinions.

He is in favor with the snug Court establishment: Chief Justice Warren assigned to him the writing of more important decisions this year than some others with longer service.

It is as if Justice Fortas were a freshman Senator, tabbed as a promising member of "the club." He seems certain to become a power on the Supreme Court. The importance of Justice Fortas's adherence to the liberal philosophy of his predecessor, Arthur J. Goldberg, says the New York Times, was dramatized by his one clear break from the Goldberg legacy — the Ralph Ginzburg obscenity case.

Justice Goldberg had followed the permissive Supreme Court line toward obscenity, and Justice Fortas — who had once as a lawyer filed a friend-of-court brief on behalf of Playboy magazine, calling the Federal obscenity law unconstitutional — was expected to follow suit.

But Chief Justice Warren had become deeply concerned that "panderers" were capitalizing on the Court's liberality to get rich on smut, and he pressed for a tough new doctrine to punish those who did. Justice Fortas, the only Justice not already committed on the issue, silently lined up behind the Warren view, thus creating a five-man majority willing to convict Ginzburg.

The sudden shift threw the law of obscenity into uncertainty, and the high court reluctantly agreed to go into it again next year, to clear up some of the loose ends.

Meanwhile, the prison-bound Ginzburg denounced the Court for its change of heart, reform groups across the country cranked up anti-smut drives, and Justice Fortas told a men's group in Washington he was "not ready" yet to express his views in an opinion, hinting that future changes could be in store.

In other respects Johnson's first choice for the Supreme Court has performed as expected. On the bench he is shrewd, well-prepared, incisive and occasionally a bit testy, says the New York Times. Behind the scenes he is reportedly persuasive, influential, and ambitious.

Nearly Forty Percent Of Jewish Children In Europe Go To School Before Age 17

After a decade of combined effort by the Joint Distribution Committee, the Claims Conference, and the European Jewish communities, it is estimated that over 50,000 out of 135,000 Jewish children in Europe, or nearly forty per cent, attend a Jewish day or supplementary school before they reach the age of seventeen, it was stated at Geneva by Charles H. Jordan, executive vice-chairman and director-general of the J.D.C.

Mr. Jordan said that over 30,000 are currently enrolled. This represents an overall increase of about 13,000 children since 1959, according to figures presented in the new 1965 Survey of Jewish Day and Supplementary Schools in Western Continental Europe just published by the JDC education department. Figures in the survey are based on replies to a questionnaire submitted to 40 day schools and over 300 Talmudai Total and supplementary schools in eleven countries in Western Europe. These included ORT vocational schools.

The survey is the fourth of its kind, the first having been published in 1956, Mr. Jordan said. He noted that, as the record of a continuing process of study and evaluation, the periodical surveys constitute an important element in JDC's technical assistance to the Jewish schools in Europe. JDC receives funds for its educational and health and welfare programs mainly from the United Jewish Appeal.

A major development in Jewish education in Europe since 1962 has been the opening of five new schools and the expansion of others, he said. These included three new primary schools, of which two are in Lyons; one in Brussels, and two secondary schools; opened by the Alliance Israélite Universelle, one in Paris, one in Nice. Two large schools in Antwerp and the Jewish community school in Milan have also been expanded at the secondary level in this period. As a result, of 6,000 children attending Jewish day schools, some 3,000, nearly twice as many as in 1959, are now in secondary schools where teaching is on a relatively high intellectual level.

A further increase in enrollment in day schools is anticipated because of the large numbers of children now in kindergarten and increased Jewish populations, especially in France and Belgium. However, improved bus transportation in the large cities, better premises, equipment and teachers, expanded boarding facilities, and more scholarships are viewed as necessary conditions for continued growth, Mr. Jordan stated.

He pointed out that activities of the Commission on Jewish Education of the Standing Conference of European Jewish Community Services and the Jewish Agency's intensified program of education in the Diaspora (Dispersion) have to some extent filled the gap left by the disappearance of the Claims Conference.

In addition, Mr. Jordan stressed that the Education Department will continue, as it has in the past, to assist in the in-service training of teachers, and with the publication of "Hamar", the only Jewish pedagogical journal in Europe. It also serves as a clearing house for educational materials and is working closely with the Standing Conference's Commission on Jewish Education in the development of a cooperative inter-community effort to deal with problems of Jewish education in Europe.

However, greater community interest and involvement in Jewish education are a fundamental prerequisite for the continued growth of Jewish schools in Europe, Mr. Jordan said. "While international organizations can be of very real assistance, the obligation of providing Jewish education for their children and young people rests primarily with the communities. The children are theirs, the schools are theirs, theirs is the basic responsibility of maintaining and improving their educational programs. The fact that they have done so much in the past means that they can take much of the credit for the achievements which the Survey records."

MONTREAL MEETINGS

★ CANADIAN JEWISH ★

Congress: "A deep anxiety over the continued isolation of the Jews in the Soviet Union from Jewish communities in other countries and their inability to maintain a communal existence to which they are entitled within the framework of the Soviet Constitution and Soviet policy towards its nationalities" was conveyed to Paul Martin, Secretary of State for External Affairs, by a delegation of the Congress. A Jewish Leadership Conference, which met in Montreal a few weeks ago, appealed that the Soviet Union restore its Jewish citizens to a position of equality with all other nationalities in accordance with the Soviet Constitution and Law; enable its Jewish citizens freely to practice, enhance, and perpetuate their culture and religion by removing all obstacles designed to restrict this freedom; make available all institutions, schools, textbooks and material necessary to teach Jewish children the languages, history, and beliefs of the Jewish people; permit the Jews of the USSR freely to develop Jewish life and to associate and work with Jewish groups inside and outside the Soviet Union; use all means at its disposal to eradicate anti-Semitism, and permit Soviet Jewish families, separated as a result of the Nazi holocaust, to be re-united with their relatives abroad. The Congress asked that the Government of Canada express deep and abiding concern for the rights of the Jews in the Soviet Union and convey this concern to the Soviet authorities in the name of humanity and justice. The Congress delegation, was led by Saul Hayes, Q.C., and comprised Prof. Perry Meyer, Rabbi S. M. Zambrowsky, Dr. Samuel Lewin (Montreal); Hy. Bessin, and Mervin Minsky (Ottawa). The delegation noted that recently there have been visible signs of "relaxation of the difficulties which the Jewish community has suffered for such a long time" and that these manifestations "strengthen the hope that the Soviet authorities will rectify the situation, fully and restore the Jews of the Soviet Union to a position of equality with other religious and ethnic groups". Mr. Martin told the delegation: "It should be clear to all the world, including the Soviet Union, that we deplore and condemn discrimination in any country; in any form, on grounds of race or creed or colour or nationality. The cause of human rights and human freedom is and must be indivisible. Let us not limit our concern just to anti-Semitism in the USSR, important and vital as that concern must be. Let us condemn vigorously all signs of discrimination, of failure to permit fundamental human freedoms, and of retrograde laws which grind down the individual anywhere in the world."

An exchange of agricultural high school students between Canada and Israel is the centennial project. Mrs. Sam. Blanshoy, of Montreal, is national president. The students would each spend about six weeks in the other country during the summer of 1967 and visit Expo 67 in Montreal. The centennial project was planned to highlight support of agricultural high schools in Israel, and active participation in Canadian affairs. The students will have an opportunity to broaden their education in agricultural matters and gain appreciation of the economics and culture of another land. The Canadian Council of 4-H Clubs is co-operating with the organization in helping to select a Canadian student to go to Israel and in planning here for the Israeli visitor. In Israel, government agricultural authorities and the Motezt Hapalot, will select the Israeli student to come to Canada and arrange for the Canadian student's visit to their country. All expenses of the student exchange will be met by this organization.

Anti-Jewish Vandalism Is Expressive Of A Lingering Violent Anti-Semitism

The recent nationwide upsurge of incidents of vandalism against synagogues and other Jewish institutions in the U.S. is not part of any centrally directed campaign or the works of any of the known organized anti-Semitic movements, according to a detailed analysis issued by the American Jewish Committee.

The report, made public by Dr. John Shawson, executive vice-president of the pioneer human relations agency, warns that these outbreaks are expressive of "a lingering violent anti-Semitism" and hence more disquieting than if they were part of an organized plot.

The Committee points out that the 14 anti-Semitic incidents in the United States in the five-month period ending December 31, 1965, are the most reported in any comparable period since the epidemic following the 1959 Christmas Eve Cologne synagogue desecrations. The report stresses that the most serious of these incidents were "cases of wanton destruction most likely perpetrated by adults" rather than daubings or smearings done by juveniles or teenagers. It adds that even where teenagers were the culprits, the acts could not be classified as "mischievous behavior" but "vindictive vandalism and deliberate expressions of hostility toward Jews."

During the five-month period incidents were reported in San Francisco, Chicago, Albany, Hillsdale, N. J.; New York, Mt. Lebanon, Pa.; Trumbull, Conn.; Brooklyn, N. Y.; Woodbridge, N. J.; New Orleans; Bridgeport, Conn.; and Holyoke, Mass.

On the night of October 6 (Yom Kippur), at Congregation Bikur Cholim in Bridgeport, Conn., vandals slashed and damaged religious and ornamental objects and the gas jets on a basement stove were turned on. On October 15, in suburban Trumbull, Conn., the word "Jew" was painted on the walls of two homes. On October 27, two "Molotov Cocktails" bombs were thrown through a basement window of Congregation Bikur Cholim, scorching the floor as they exploded.

Outside the New England area, the following anti-Semitic desecrations were recorded within the past year:

In early August a series of anti-Semitic daubings and swastika smearings were discovered in San Francisco. A swastika, the slogan "Kill All Jews" and the initials K.K.K., were found on the wall of a public school, an apartment house, and several mail boxes. Four youths, ranging in age from 14 to 19, were considered by the police to be prime suspects.

On August 13, three Chicago teenagers were each sentenced to ten-day jail terms after being found guilty of painting swastikas on the walls and windows of Temple Shalom on Chicago's North Side. On September 15, authorities in Albany, N. Y., announced the arrest of two teenage youths on charges of having twice desecrated a cemetery belonging to the Workmen's Circle, a Jewish fraternal organization, and a cemetery belonging to Temple Israel.

On September 22, one week after the formal dedication of the Hillside, N.J., Jewish Center, a two-foot high swastika and the letters "SS" were found daubed in red paint on the door. Preceding the discovery of the desecrations, a number of township commissioners as well as Mayor Robert Diamond, a Jew, received telephone calls in which anti-Semitic language was used.

In New York City, during the October 23 week-end, the Police Department was asked to and did deploy as a protective measure for worshippers at 36 synagogues and 18 yeshivas after 20 East Side rabbis reported a series of attacks by hoodlums on both young and old Jews en route to and from synagogues and Jewish schools in the area. On October 25, in New Orleans, 21 gravestones at the Dispersed of Judah Cemetery were painted with swastikas and hate slogans. On October 27, six boys, age 13 to 15, were arrested as the vandals responsible for setting a two-alarm fire in Congregation Sons of Israel in the Bensonhurst section of Brooklyn, N. Y. Detectives reported that four of the youths who set the $400,000 fire did so out of spite.

During the October 30 week-end, Temple Emanuel in Mt. Lebanon, Pa., was desecrated when three swastikas were discovered by Sabbath worshippers to have been painted near the premises. Two swastikas, about three feet square, were scrawled on the sidewalk in gold paint, and another swastika was found smeared on a parking sign in the rear of the building. Additionally, "anti-Semitic words" were discovered chalked on the Congregation's windows. One week prior to the October 30 daubings, the Temple's rabbi discovered anti-Semitic scribbles.

The American Jewish Committee report contrasts this cluster of desecrations with the facts surrounding the world-wide epidemic of anti-Semitic incidents following the swastika-smearing desecration on the synagogue in Cologne, Germany, at the end of 1959. This event set off more than 2,500 reported cases in a score of countries, including 650 in the United States, between Christmas and the end of February 1960.

An analysis of the 1959-60 epidemic, the American Jewish Committee report recalled, revealed no single root-cause but pointed to the fact that the thousands of acts of vandalism were inspired in the main by saturating publicity which was given the incidents, causing imitative behavior. In the overwhelming majority of cases, culprits taken into custody were juveniles or teenagers.

Turning to the more recent incidents, the American Jewish Commit-

Thurgood Marshall, who had been asked by Mr. Truman to attend the ceremonies, received prolonged applause when he rose to speak. He accepted the ovation on Mr. Truman's behalf although much of the warmth was obviously intended for the distinguished Negro leader, who has been associated with the struggle for civil rights.

"Not only is the occasion unprecedented but the undertaking is audacious," Mr. Marshall said. "In a smoldering world, we here give physical embodiment to our faith in the capacity of reason and science to bank the fires of violence, to seek out the causes of war, to lay out paths to peace," reports the New York Times. The Solicitor General, said that the peace center would be well situated in the soil that first nourished the principles of a social order worthy of man.

RUSSIAN JEWRY: FLOWERING AND FROST

By Maurice Samuel, author and lecturer, in the Congress Bi-Weekly, of the American Jewish Congress

When in moments of despondency we linger over some of the might-have-beens of Jewish history, no episode strikes us with quite the same poignancy as the Russian Jews of fifty to a hundred years ago. No doubt we are moved in this way because, unlike Polish Jewry, Russian Jewry still lives, however weakened; still seems to have a chance of recovering some of its ancient strength; but just as certainly it is the recollection of that sudden and brilliant efflorescence between the middle of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth, contrasting with so calamitous an ensuing frost, which sets us brooding over the thought: "If only it had been given a chance, what could not Russian Jewry be doing for us today?"

And "us" is used in two senses here: we who brood over this question are a minority, the ones acquainted with the history of Russian Jewry. And the "us" who could have been benefitted means not only American Jewry, which must find its way into the future without the companionship of what was, potentially at least, the greatest of all exile Jewries; it means also Israel, still struggling to develop its forms in the original spirit under the pressure of new elements to whom that spirit is a stranger.

I should like to make it clear at once that these reflections have no connection with that unforgotten sentimentalization of the old Russian Jewry which has of late become a fashion among Gentiles as well as Jews. "Nothing," writes Herbert Miller, "is more undignified than a past become quaint," and nothing could be more quaint than the picture of the Russian Jewry world now crystallizing in a large part of the public mind. The actuality of that world was far more impressive and far more important than one would guess from the current vaudeville and musical comedy rendition of it; and it is as the beginning of a healthy corrective that I welcome the volume which prompts these remarks, Russian Jewry, 1860-1917. Edited by Jacob Frankin, Gregor Aronson, and Alexis Goldenweiser. Thomas Yoseloff.

In the popular imagination the shetl dominates the Russian Jewish scene to the exclusion of every other sector. This is a distortion. It is true that until the period here being considered the shetl was the great reservoir of Jewish life; and it remained so for part of the period. Even until the end it contained the highest concentration of religious and national energy, and from it flowed continuously to the cities — as from healthy provinces to the capital in all countries and peoples — the men of outstanding merit. But in the last third of the nineteenth century the masses of Jews in the Russian cities were leaving the segregation of the old ways and entering into the mainstream of Russian life, with diverse effects.

The impulse to this movement was given by the great changes introduced into the status of Russian Jewry by the liberalizing policies of Alexander II. In the brief period — some two decades — during which most of the restrictions on educational and other opportunities were lifted, a powerful outward tide set in; and once begun it could not be arrested when the restrictions were imposed again after the assassination of Alexander in 1881 — not to be lifted, but rather increased and aggravated, until the revolution of 1917.

Our generation is on the whole unacquainted with the very considerable role Jews played in the development of modern Russia, a role which would have been immeasurably larger had free play been given to Jewish talents under the reigns of Alexander III and Nicholas II. As it was, the Jewish contribution was still out of proportion to the population ratio.

The handicaps under which the contribution was made is well described in the essays of Jacob J. Frankin and Alexis Goldenweiser, the achievements in the economic field by I. M. Dinar. In industry, commerce, transportation — particularly the railroads — the record is astonishingly high. If it be asked how this could go hand in hand with a hostile government attitude, including a severe numerus clausus in the high schools and universities, the answer is that necessity is a notorious flouter of law. The thrust toward modernization in Russia, delayed and therefore the more imperious, was opposed by a rigid autocracy more concerned with the perpetuation of its status than the welfare of the country; but it could not be contained. And Jews of ability were used in a land where abilities were still scarce.

The man who symbolized the rebellion against national paralysis in the past was Count Witte, who, in his determination to bring Russia up to West European standards, took talent wherever he found it, and that not only among Jews, but among politically "unsound" elements. He employed such a large number of Jews that his monarch, Alexander III, anti-Semitic and autocrat par excellence, once asked him whether it was true that he was a partisan of the Jews (Witte had, as it happened, married a baptized Jewess). Witte's answer, as he records it in his memoirs, is almost part of the folklore of Russian Jewry:

I told His Majesty that I found it difficult to answer his question, and asked his permission to answer it with a question. Permission being granted, I asked whether he could drown all the Jews in the Black Sea. If he could do so, I would understand such a solution of the problem. If he could not, then the only solution was to enable them to live, and this was possible only through the gradual abolition of the special laws created for the Jews. His Majesty said nothing in reply and retained his benevolence toward me till the day of his death.

Nicholas II, a trivial figure compared with his father, was impregnated with anti-Semitism by the home atmosphere and by his tutor Pobedonostsev, who continued to be an influence after Nicholas came to the throne. The benevolence which Alexander III extended to Witte in spite of his "lax" attitude toward Jews, failed in his son, who, a weakling and superstitious, the inorganic victim of a pathologically dominating wife, had not even his father's narrow intelligence.

Nicholas endured with impatience Witte's modernizing labors, resented bitterly his support of the demand for a constitution, and got rid of him after the abortive revolution of 1905. The legal position of the Jews continued to deteriorate.

The pogroms of the 1880's returned in more savage form between 1903 and 1906 — with the moral sanction of the Emperor — and still the restless vigor of the Jews, surmounting barriers, carried them forward. It must not, however, be forgotten, that large and influential sections of the Russian public were opposed to the anti-Semitic policies of the government, and that a predominantly liberal press flourished despite the censorship.

But the achievements of the Jews must be seen in perspective. Only the most gifted, the most determined and the most fortunate broke through. The vast majority of Russian Jewry lived in abject poverty and in isolation from the modern world, so that there was an immense distance between the upper stratum and the submerged mass. Even in the upper stratum there were large subdivisions of defeat.

The famous Jewish legal talents which established themselves in the courts, as they are described here by Saypol Kucherov in his essay, "Jews in The Russian Bar," had as their background the far larger number who, perhaps as well equipped, were confined to the role of obscure office assistants. The successful professionals in all fields were surrounded by a large periphery of failures, frustrated in their education or in the pursuit of their careers.

Nevertheless the number of the undefeated was large enough, their quality high enough, to startle Western Jews of that time when the phenomenon came under their observation. As far back as the first Zionist Congress, Herzl, whose conception of Russian Jewry, like that of most of his contemporaries, was one of uniform medieval backwardness and helplessness, had to write:

"There rose before our eyes a Russian Jewry the strength of which we had not even suspected. . . . What a humiliation for us, who had taken our superiority for granted! All these professors, doctors, lawyers, industrialists, engineers and merchants stand on an educational level which is certainly not lower than ours. Nearly all of them are masters of two or three languages, and that they are men of ability in their particular lines is proved by the simple fact that they have succeeded in a land where success is particularly difficult for Jews."

The Russian Jews with whom Herzl first came in contact were, of course, the delegates to the Congress. They were the cream of Russian Jewry in respect of Jewishness. They represented the natural and the spiritual vitality of the people. Herzl wrote of them, further:

"If I wanted to summarize the impression — and it was a very strong one — I would say: They possess the inner wholeness which the majority of European Jews have lost. . . . When meeting them we realized what had given our forefathers the strength to endure the heaviest ordeals. In their image our history appeared before us in its distinctiveness and vitality."

This was not putting it too strongly. The essays by Gershon Svei and the late Yitzhak Ben Zvi on the rise of Zionism in Russia, and those by Yudel Mark and the late J. M. Klausner on the Yiddish and Hebrew literature of Russian Jewry, give only the briefest glimpse of that wealth of creation on which the present generations in America and Israel still draw. It was not Zionism alone which received its strongest impetus from Russian Jewry. The institutions which Russian Jewry founded — like the Ort — were the models for the modern social instruments of exile Jewry too.

The names of Weizmann and Ben-Curion are balanced by those of the Jewish goles (Ezra) nationalists, Dubnov and Zhitlovsky. The Jewishness of American Jewry, derives from that of Russian and Polish Jewry, with the Russian predominating. What we have in America today in the way of Jewish life came to us with the enormous streams of immigrants that set in with the 1880's.

But what is peculiarly fascinating about the Russian Jewry of the period under observation is its extraordinary polarity. The present volume deals only with the affirmative aspects of Russian Jewish life; even so, a mere five hundred pages is altogether insufficient to do justice to the subject. The other side of the story is not touched on. Yet the centrifugal and the centripetal forces in Russian Jewry were both powerful.

There is no way of establishing the figures for Russian Jewish assimilation in the second half of the nineteenth century, for the process was neither uniform nor strictly measurable. The official records of the Synod state that between 1830 and 1890 sixty thousand Jews were baptized into the Orthodox Russian Church. However, many more seem to have been baptized into other Christian Churches. Three thousand baptisms a year — that is not too high a figure — out of a Jewish population which rose to five or five and a half million, may not seem symptomatic of a dangerous condition.

The temptation was, in certain circles, particularly insidious, for by this one act a Jew saw all the obstacles to an academic or official career leveled to the ground. Nevertheless, the odium attaching to this step and the cynicism it called for — indicating an equal contempt for Judaism and Christianity — gives the figures greater weight.

But the significant aspect of assimilation lay elsewhere, namely, in those Jews, numbering in the tens and hundreds of thousands, who simply lost interest in being Jewish as they acquired interest in Russian life or merely followed the line of least resistance.

These were of two kinds: in the bourgeoisie the decline of Jewish identity had no ideology and was simply careerism; though there might be a pretense of ideology clothed in assimilationist idealism, the revolutionary ideology was assimilation accompanied by the salvation of mankind. Taken in all its aspects, it is possible that the assimilatory trend in Russian Jewry in its most flourishing period was as marked as, or even more marked than in American Jewry today.

And this, paradoxically, may lead to encouraging reflections. It is not the quantity of assimilation that is determinant for the future of a Jewish community — unless, of course, it reaches fantastic proportions such as we are not approaching today; it is rather the quality of the unassimilating core.

The history of the Jewish people is a record of persistence in the teeth of constant assimilation. Had it been otherwise we should at present be outnumbering even the Chinese! The abounding Jewish vitality of Russian Jewry in the midst of a persistent drainage of strength and numbers, its ability to transfer to present-day Jew-

PASTRAMI INVADERS THE ORIENT

A New York tourist who arrives in Hong Kong after 12,000 miles of travel homesick for a hot pastrami sandwich need no longer fast.

If Canton cuisine, or the Shanghai, Peking, Szechwan, or any of the dozen other varieties of oriental food available in Hong Kong do not assuage his yearning, he can repair to Lindy's East. Lindy's East bills itself as "The Only Kosher Restaurant East of the United States," but many restaurateurs in Europe and Israel, says the New York Times, would contest the claim, and those to whom kosher means strictly kosher would be scandalized by the menu.

A group of the shareholders in Hong Kong's newest restaurant were given a guided tour by Irving Koval, the Bronx-born manager, whose background includes work in the Borscht Belt and for Restaurant Associates, which operates the Four Seasons and a number of other fashionable New York establishments.

In the kitchen, Mr. Koval displayed a piece of pastrami with a flourish of a born showman.

"See," he said, pointing to a tag. "Hebrew National Kosher Foods, Inc. The very best pastrami."

Then he pointed to a United States Government stamp. "And see," he said. "Inspected and passed by the Department of Agriculture. All our foods are inspected and passed by Department of Agriculture."

Mr. Koval, who is a large young man, bent to his task with enthusiasm. "Lindy's East will be a completely superior operation," he said. "We have the most modern equipment ever assembled in any restaurant and I mean any restaurant. We will win awards. I've won awards before and I'll win them here."

The shareholders shuffled their feet and looked wistfully at the pastrami. Mr. Koval took the hint and began slicing it with practiced strokes.

"We have equipment in this kitchen which has never been tried in a restaurant before," he lectured over his work. "We have the same kind of filtration system used by the astronauts to purify their waste products."

The shareholders looked a little startled.

"But of course we'll only be using it to purify the local water," Mr. Koval said.

Mr. Koval placed slices of pastrami on a plate and the shareholders stirred eagerly. Mr. Koval flung an arm in the direction of a gleaming, glass-fronted oven. "This is a convection oven," he said, reports the New York Times. "Hot air circulates through minute holes in the side of the oven. It will bake one hundred and forty pies in eight minutes."

The shareholders looked duly impressed but continued to stare at the plate of pastrami, which was moving in Mr. Koval's hand in the direction of another gleaming oven.

"This," Mr. Koval said, "is the microwave oven. It generates electronic waves of energy. Radio waves have a frequency of 550,000 to 1,600,000 cycles per minute. Television waves have a frequency of 2 trillion to 213 million cycles per second. These

The Union of Russian Jews, which has issued the present volume, should be considering the preparation of further studies of the same scope.

electronic waves have a frequency of two trillion 450 million cycles per second."

Mr. Koval swung up the oven door and placed the plate of pastrami inside. He closed the door and pushed a button.

"Count three," he said.

Everybody counted three, some more quickly than others. Mr. Koval pressed another button, opened the oven door, and picked up the plate.

"Hot pastrami," he said. "Have some."

The shareholders needed no second bidding. After a few bites they looked at Mr. Koval with respect and admiration written on their faces.

"This, in a nutshell, is the whole reason for Lindy's East," said Norman Fried, a New Yorker "from the West Side" who now calls Hong Kong home.

"For ten years a number of friends and I have been saying, 'What Hong Kong needs is a kosher delicatessen.' It's nineteenth-century nostalgia. But we also think it will be a paying proposition." It has been an expensive proposition. Mr. Fried, his business associate, Harold Rothstein, and a number of other Americans who rank as "Old China Hands" by virtue of ten years or more residence, says the New York Times, joined to raise $200,000 to launch Lindy's East.

The shareholders include American expatriates in the fields of textiles, finance, and journalism and ten Chinese businessmen who don't know a bagel from a blintz but feel that Lindy's East is a sound investment.

The initial expenses have included $27,000 for the first shipment of frozen loafs.

"We're importing everything from the United States," Mr. Koval said. "Corned beef, lobsters from Maine, chopped liver, prime beef, every kind of smoked fish, every kind of smoked, pickled, and cured delicacy. We're also importing rye and pumpernickel bread and bagels. And of course cheesecake."

The site of Hong Kong's busy Queen's Road is a choice one but the restaurant's owners are paying one of the top prices in this city of high rentals.

"We're paying but $2 a square foot a month," Mr. Koval said. "This means our rent is higher than any restaurant of comparable size anywhere in the United States! We could have a site on Fifth Avenue and 57th Street in New York for the same rent."

Apart from Americans resident in Hong Kong and tourists, the restaurant is expected to attract American servicemen on leave from Vietnam and Chinese businessmen, who, according to Mr. Fried will go to Lindy's East "rather like New Yorkers going to a Chinese restaurant."

Mr. Koval finally escorted his visitors to his special pride, an American-style soda fountain. He said Lindy's would manufacture its own ice cream from raw ingredients imported from the United States.

"And if a New Yorker can't find an egg cream in his own neighborhood then he can just pack his bags and take a trip to Hong Kong," Mr. Koval said, reports the New York Times.

He did not say what the four million Chinese there would make of the mysterious New York egg cream, a beverage that contains neither eggs nor cream.

The Hong Kong delicatessen has no connection with Lindy's Restaurant at Broadway and 51st Street, in New York.

Leader Headed Shanghai Jewry When It Had 25,000, And Until His Death, Leaving Twenty-three

A few months ago, the Chinese Jewish community stood at 24 persons. Today the number is 23 due to the death of the one man who for 44 years helped to guide Chinese Jewry through its many difficulties and remained alone, at its head as it dwindled from 25,000 to the handful remaining.

P. I. Yudalevich, a widower and retired business man, died at the end of May according to a report received in New York by the World Jewish Congress. He was about seventy. In the message to the World Jewish Congress the Shanghai Jewish community wrote: "During the past twenty years, Mr. Yudalevich held many responsible offices with the Shanghai Jewish Hospital, Jewish Club, Hebrew Relief Society and Shelter House, Ashkenazi Jewish Communal Association, and the Jewish Community Council. His life was a history of selfless dedication to Jewish welfare and his sudden demise is an irreparable loss to the local community."

Throughout the recent years he had remained in regular contact with the World Jewish Congress and with other major Jewish organizations, reporting on developments within the community and, as far as was humanly possible, maintaining the community services for those who remained.

Although he was the head of the community he personally attended to detailed work. This was particularly so in recent years when, with little or no help, he personally issued hundreds of Ghetto Letters and other certificates to applicants all over the world. Each person able to produce such a letter was entitled to receive restitution from the relevant German and Austrian Governments and the requests from former Chinese Jews kept coming in until Mr. Yudalevich's death. Under his guidance community services such as Shelter House, kosher facilities, medical care, and Jewish education had been maintained despite a constant dwindling of the community as its members migrated or died.

Messages of condolence were sent to the community by the World Jewish Congress.
